Aping Mankind: Neuromania, Darwinitis and the ...

Raymond Tallis's Aping Mankind is an ambitious book. One part is a methodological critique of pop-neuroscience and pop-darwinism; another is a metaphysical journey designed to separate consciousness from the brain and rescue libertarian free will, humanism, and moral progress from a variety of 'pernicious' reductionisms.

Aping Mankind: Neuromania, Darwinitis and the ...

So what Aping Mankind presents is a comprehensive and compelling case for the falsity of nearly every one of the pillars of fashionable materialist opinion; at the very least, it ought to force Neuromaniacs and sufferers of Darwinitis to reconsider the rational foundation of their positions. But the soundness of Tallis' argument is, paradoxically, what makes reading his book a rather dispiriting endeavor, because, of course, the materialists of the world will not be the least bit discomfited ...
